Many of us working with the adolescent population have come across an individual who struggles to focus, has a hard time sitting still, is easily distracted, can be poorly organized, and seems to have difficulty concentrating on one topic at a time. Working with this type of adolescent can be frustrating and at times as professionals we can feel overwhelmed or exhausted. Therefore it is important that we learn effective strategies and interventions to utilize in order to minimize our frustrations and keep the individual as our focus.

Before we can know what interventions to use with an adolescent struggling with Attention Deficit Disorder we must first get to know the situation and what they are struggling with. What are their symptoms? What areas of their life are being affected by their symptoms? What else is going on in the individual’s life? What is it that they need from us as professionals? It is important to learn the adolescent’s unique behaviors and get to know their strengths and weaknesses. As professionals we can build our interventions around the adolescent’s strengths to make fun, obtainable goals. We can then help them to understand what is expected of them and assist them in achieving their own success. Whether the environment is at school or at home, creating a positive, reinforcing environment is an essential piece in helping the adolescent work on accomplishing their goals.

An adolescent with Attention Deficit Disorder needs structure to assist them in completing tasks and assignments. As professionals we must take the role of coaching them along and teaching them ways to effectively perform and complete tasks. Evaluate your standard of success for the adolescent you are working with and acknowledge that any progress is good progress. Don’t expect perfection and set realistic goals for yourself as a professional. Be sure that the individual is aware of your expectations and guide them along their path to success.
