Adolescent Mental Health:
Stabilizing Our Youth in an Ever-Changing World

Today’s youth face stressors and challenges that are unlike any we have seen before. These stressors can often lead youth to experience anxiety, depression, and even suicidal thoughts. Thankfully, church leaders are in perfect positions to recognize early warning signs and help foster resiliency.

Do You Know the Warning Signs of Mental Illness?

Social and academic pressures. Unstable home environments. Perilous world events. Adolescents seem to be facing more threats to their mental stability now than ever before. Not all adolescents handle these stressors in the same manner, with 20% of teens developing a serious mental illness. Recognizing warning signs and intervening as soon as possible can be crucial for preventing the worsening of symptoms.

The church can be the first line of defense. Adolescents are often actively involved in Sunday school, youth group, and summer church camps. Church leaders therefore have many opportunities to identify potential mental health problems early and to intervene or make referrals to professionals. Some of the signs you may attune to include:

- Withdrawal from peers or youth group activities.
- Increased difficulty focusing or concentrating.
- Increased irritability or agitation.
- Negative or disparaging comments about herself.
- Fatigue.
- Crisis of faith.

If you notice any of these warning signs, talk to the youth about her current stressors and coping skills then approach her parents about getting her enrolled in therapy.

“I Don’t Want to Go to Therapy”

You may be working with an adolescent who is resistant to the idea of therapy. Strategies that may encourage them to follow through on your referral to treatment include:

1. Normalize the need to talk to someone about their stress and problems.
2. If they seem worried about social judgment, tell them their actions may inspire others to seek help.
3. Help them understand therapy is not a lifelong commitment.
4. Remind them that therapy is confidential, unless they are in danger.
5. Correct negative self-talk like “I’m crazy” with positive statements like “I’m brave for asking for help.”

Making the proper therapy referral can be a life-changing (even life-saving) decision. Perspectives has several Christian therapists who specialize in adolescent services. We are here to help. Call today!

Adolescent Resiliency

While some adolescents may develop mental health problems in the face of life’s challenges, others seem to press forward with less difficulty. These resilient teens are able to develop healthy thinking and coping patterns that minimize the negative impact of the stressors around them.

Three factors that contribute to adolescents persevering through challenges are:

1. Bonding to caring adults outside of their families.
2. Connections to positive organizations.
3. Possession of personal faith.

A teenagers local church can provide all three of these essential components to resiliency. However, they will not know how to utilize these factors on their own. Youth pastors and leaders need to teach their members how to utilize their faith, youth group activities, and church social connections to manage their daily stress.

Knowing the warning signs, making referrals appropriately, and fostering resiliency are all steps that youth pastors and leaders can take to improve the overall emotional wellbeing of their members. Together we can provide stability to our teens and help them feel secure in an constantly-changing world.
